SwissAmerican Tax Institute

Switzerland and the diversity of its cantons offer to multinationals and high net worth individuals a tremendous number of attractive tax planning tools, most of which remain unknown to international practitioners. The contributions of world-renowned panelists to this state-of-the-art conference is thus designed to satisfy the growing interest in the competitive Swiss tax system.

This conference is organized by the SwissAmerican Tax Institute, aimed at promoting relations between the Swiss and American tax communities. The Institute creates and supports innovative educational programs and business networking events. For further information, please contact the directors, Fouad Sayegh and Brice Thionnet, at www.swissamtax.com.

The New York University School of Law Program in International Taxation

The NYU School of Law is committed to legal education for a global economy. An important component of that commitment is the International Taxation Program for Foreign Students (ITP). Working side by side with colleagues from the United States and other countries, students in the program study international taxation in a global context. Whether remaining in the United States or returning to their respective countries after graduation, ITP students will be equipped intellectually for the practice of law in a rapidly changing global economy. The program offers the largest and most varied selection of international tax courses available at any U.S. law school. It also includes various enrichment programs, including the International Tax Program Lunch Lecture Series, a group of informal seminars offered by a variety of international tax experts.
